White Terror and the Red: A Novel of Revolutionary Russia (Modern Jewish Experience Series)

Abraham Cahan

German health-resort taking the mineral waters. When not in the castle in which he was staying with his train he affected the life of an ordinary citizen. He did so as much from necessity as from choice. Czar or subject, the same water must be drunk at the same spot and hour by all who seek its cure. Nor can any distinction be made in the matter of the walk which the patient is to take after draining his two or three gobletsful. The promenade at a watering place is a great paradeground for the display of plumage, the gayest and costliest gowns being reserved for the procession that follows the taking of the remedy; but while the race is under way and everybody is striving to throw everybody else into the shade, the fact of their being there pierces each dress as with Xrays, showing their flesh to be of the same fragile clay. So the Czar accepted the levelling effect of the place good-naturedly and sought diversion in the unsustained role of a common mortal.
