Excerpt from Catechism of Agricultural Chemistry and Geology

In introducing this little work to the notice of the American public, I am encouraged by the hope that a conviction as to the importance of the new knowledge of which it treats, already fixed in many minds, will soon become universal. Agriculture, the art in which nine-tenths of the capital of civilized nations is embarked, upon which all depend for subsistence, is rising towards its proper rank as a science. We look forward to the time when it will be generally conducted upon fixed and scientific principles, dependent upon immutable laws. Obstacles may retard, but cannot permanently arrest its progress, and those who receive the light that we now possess, and keep pace with our increasing knowledge, will surely reap the benefit which always results from the application of enlightened skill; while those who linger behind must be content to grope on in blind uncertainty, as our forefathers have done.
